

Yet Another Muslim Plot

— research today in a national newspaper

PUBLISHED ON 01/04/2014

Careful research by a newspaper reveals today that Edward the Sixth, the half-brother of Elizabeth the First, popularly known as Good Queen Bess, was secretly a Muslim. He did not live long but nevertheless laid the foundations for the gradual Muslimisation of British culture during the centuries which followed his reign.

In his own lifetime (1537—1553) Edward's great achievement was to persuade his half-sister Elizabeth, who was played by Dame Judy Dench in a recent TV series, not to demonise Muslims.

Instead of demonising Muslims, he maintained, the English should demonise Catholics and, though to a lesser extent, people in Scotland.

As a result of Edward's efforts many British Muslims in the sixteenth century were spared the embarrassment of being burnt alive in public, and Islam as a religion was not seen as a major threat to world civilisation.

But Edward's greatest achievement was to found prestigious schools which would carry his teachings into the national consciousness over the next five centuries.

It was particularly in Birmingham, though also in other cities in northern England such as Bradford and Manchester, that his ideas took hold. In due course the schools which he founded in Birmingham and other northern cities became centres of excellence for Islamic Studies, and for the hallowing of Islamic architecture, astrology, medicine, mathematics, theology and ethics.

As a result of the far-reaching influence of the schools which Edward VI founded, Birmingham became in the late twentieth century a magnet for Muslims from all over the world. They received there a warm welcome and they for their part made magnificent contributions to the city's education system, and to its wealth and fame.

'Where the iron heart of England throbs beneath its sombre robe,' wrote Edward in a youthful poem, 'stand schools whose sons will make them great and famous round the globe'. Yes indeed, and thanks to typically painstaking research by a Sunday newspaper the secret of Birmingham's greatness is now known — the moral and intellectual values of Islam.

Michael Gove is said to be interested in the findings of the investigation. An official from the Department for Education confirms today (1 April 2014): 'We are monitoring the situation very closely.'

Background

Several articles about fantasies in Birmingham have been published by the Sunday Times in recent weeks, and have been duly reprinted in various other papers. For a perceptive, passionate and up-to-date review of the saga, and of the damage it is doing to children, staff and governors in Birmingham schools, see an article by M G Khan in the Times Educational Supplement, Friday 28 March 2014.

Source: This was a blogpost for the Insted Consultancy, 1 April 2014 (note the date!)

There is a dossier about the Trojan Horse affair, consisting mainly of articles, talks and blogposts published by the Insted Consultancy during summer 2014, at <https://www.patience-and-passion.org/faith.html>